The Latin alphabet, owing to political causes, finally displaced the other national scripts of Italy. As the alphabet of Rome, it became the literary alphabet of Latin Christendom and the literary alphabet of Europe and America. It is now, with the single exception of the Arabic, the only alphabet possessing any claim to extension. Its great historical importance may therefore justify a more minute examination of its peculiarities than is necessary in the case of Etruscan and other defunct

The Latin alphabet, owing to political causes, finally displaced the other national scripts of Italy. As the alphabet of Rome, it became the alphabet of Latin Christendom, and the literary alphabet of Europe and America. It is now, with the single exception of the Arabic, the only alphabet any claim to cosmopolitan extension. Its great historical importance may therefore justify a more minute examination of its peculiarities.
